What is Homotoxicology?

Homeotoxicology is a scientifically proven and extensively researched medical practice, that studies the influences of toxic substances in the human body, where symptoms and disease are seen as a result of the biological resistance to toxic substances.

What are toxins?

Today's environment contains thousands of chemicals, many of which are toxic to the human body. Exogenous toxins that are introduced or produced from outside the human body include air pollution, synthetic chemicals in food and water, bacteria, viruses, and allopathic drug residue.

Chemicals and other toxins are absorbed into the body through organs such as the skin, lungs, and gastrointestinal tract. The liver, kidneys, skin, mucous membranes and other organs then attempt to process and expel these substances.

Endogenous toxins are produced inside the body and come from lactic acid, adrenaline, histamine, antigen-antibody complexes, nutrient deficiencies, psychological stressors, and emotional traumas. Toxins constantly challenge cells, tissues, organs, hormones, the immune system, and other protective bodily mechanisms.

In Homotoxicology the accumulation of toxins in and around the cell are the cause of disease. The various symptoms and signs of disease result from a series of reactions initiated by the self-healing mechanism to either eliminate the toxin or control its biological effect. The body will initially try purge the toxins by via first-line immune system defenses activity or will activate compensatory mechanisms if elimination is not possible.

What is Matrix Evaluation?

The Extracellular Matrix (ECM) is the transit place for all nutrition and waste elimination to and from the cell. It is essentially the environment of the cell. By looking at the acid- base balance equation between the urine and saliva – there is an indication of matrix composition and activity.

You will learn a simple clinical test to individualize a patients toxin/elimination load and what to do accordingly.
